OVERVIEW

The path towards sustainable investing has not been an easy one, with many arguments that now is the time to “build back better” and create a more sustainable corporate world. While the pandemic has no doubt emphasised how critical balance sheet resilience is for companies and their longer-term viability, it has also accelerated a number of environmental, social and governance (ESG) themes which existed before the crisis.

One major breakthrough would be the introduction of green taxonomy by the UK Government in Nov 2020 – a common framework for determining which activities can be defined as environmentally sustainable. Meanwhile, in Malaysia, Securities Commission have developed the Sustainable and Responsible Investment Roadmap for the Malaysian Capital Market (SRI Roadmap), charting a strategic direction in this evolving market landscape.

2020 also turned out to be a race for how quickly every organisation could digitally transform themselves to survive. As every organisation works to re-invent itself to survive in these challenging times, achieving greater sustainability goals will make them stronger and more resilient.

How does digitalisation and sustainability converge? Is technology an enabler to deliver a safer future?
